Working title: The Proposal

Synopsis:

It's the 18th of March 2020, a sunny afternoon in Glasgow. Ana is lying on the couch at Ruben's, her best friend. She's been ill for a week, probably with covid, but she's deeply enjoying being looked after by him, who she has fallen in love with. Ana only has the energy to go to the toilet and to read Ruben's fascinating books, and she's almost oblivious of what's going on in the outside world, until she gets a call from Henrik, her boyfriend. Henrik is an epidemiologist, he's on a work trip in Sweden and he gives the news to Ana: Europe is about to close borders, and if she doesn't get on a plane to Sweden before midnight, she will be stuck in Glasgow for a long time, away from him.

Ana must make a decision. Her life plan was to secure a work visa to stay in the UK, consolidate her career and be able to pay the loan for her expensive graduate school – but Henrik breaks to her that there won't be any jobs in the following 6 months, and the whole mess will last two years. If she goes to Sweden, he can take care of her. She's afraid. In Sweden, she doesn't know anyone apart from Henrik, she doesn't speak the language, doesn't have the right to work, and once the borders open, she would be deported back home where she would be unable to pay her debt. But she also sees an opportunity, and she tells Henrik that she can only go to Sweden if he promises to marry her so she can become an EU resident. Henrik agrees.

When Ruben gets back home, he finds Ana out of the couch, packing. She explains the situation hoping that he gives her an alternative. She would like to stay in Glasgow, carry on with her life plans, and be close to Ruben. Rubén hesitates, so she pressures him to marry her.

This is the story of the afternoon Ana proposes to two men. They must navigate their love triangle and the pressures of money and migration, to make a life changing decision in just a couple of hours.
